Rover to indeed resurrect the MG sports car

Chairman admits the rumors are true, works to plug leaks

MG will return to its roots: Simplicity

There will be a new MG sports car. Rover's chairman Sir Graham Day has ended speculation about the roadster project, confirming that the company will definitely build a new MG.

The only clue Day would give about the car was that it would echo the MG concept and be a relatively basic vehicle. It will be simple and fun, not high-tech and expensive, which could mean it will take on the Miata in showrooms.

The MG will be developed by the recently formed Rover Special Products operation which produced the latest Mini Cooper. Launch of the new MG is not expected before the 1994 model year.

It may take even longer for the car to appear in the United States. Rover still has to resolve the legal problem of dealers that sold MGs here in the 1970s and are now claiming the right to sell the new roadster.

Also of concern is the source of the rumors about the MG project. The company is tired of new product information leaking to the press and has hired former Manchester police chief John Stalker to investigate.

As many as 50 people, from top executives on down, are expected to be named as sources of those leaks. ■
